Gold nanoparticles are used in many fields such as catalysis, electronics, biology, medicine, etc. Green synthesis of nanoparticles using plant extracts is becoming an important and sustainable approach and has attracted much attention. Green synthesis of gold nanoparticles using plant extract is an interesting area of research due to its potential in producing eco-friendly, nontoxic, nontoxic, biological nanoparticles. In this work, we report the green synthesis and in vitro biological and photo-catalytic activities of gold nanoparticles synthesized using the extract of Centropogon daniellii. The green gold nanoparticles synthesized were characterized by different techniques such as UV-vis, TEM, XRD, FTIR, and DLS. The synthesized nanoparticles were used for catalytic reduction of 4-nitrophenol and photo-catalytic reduction of 4-nitrophenol. 1. Introduction

The nanoparticles play a growing role in several biological and medical processes, such as the field of catalysis, energy storage,¹ as well as in many field of medical science such as diagnosis, drug delivery,² etc. Recently, the green synthesis of nanoparticles using plant extract has attracted much attention because of its high surface to volume ratio, high energy and photo catalytic activity along with its high stability.³ Recently, nanoparticles, the gold nanoparticles (AuNP) with integration of biological molecules synthesis process is rapidly growing the interest degree in catalytic applications and diagnostics.⁴ The green synthesis of nanoparticles using plant extract is an interesting area of research due to its potential in producing eco-friendly, nontoxic, nontoxic, biological nanoparticles.
